

HP Middle School: Summer Reading 2019

Dear Middle School Readers (and Parents),

This letter is really an invitation from me to you. An invitation to be a summer reader. And yes. An invitation means that you have to decide: to accept or decline the offer. I am a teacher and a mom. You can bet that I have heard all the pros & cons to summer reading. (But let's save that debate for another time.)

What I feel matters is that you have this tsunami wave of momentum coming off of the school year pushing at your backs. You have learned so much about your reading self. Now you control the reins to your summer reading life. But sometimes it feels hard to know how to begin. So before you accept...linger on the fence...or answer no-way to my invitation. At least consider these tips:

★ Decide what books you want to begin summer with...Do you have a favorite author, genre, or series? I often love to start-finish a series over the summer because summer gives us the gift of time.

★ Determine how you will gather the books...Do you have a bedroom bookshelf bursting with books? How about a Barnes & Noble gift card that you have been saving for just the right moment? Can you borrow books from a bestie? Or even better: use a library card.

★ Study your summer calendar. Summer can be a busy time. Figure out the best time to read in your day. Everyone needs downtime. But too often downtime means video games and phones. Can you balance that time for both?

★ Reading is social. Form a book club or partnership. Even if you can't meet in person, set up a time once a week to FaceTime. Having a summer book club can help you stay motivated and committed to summer reading. (An extra bonus: you have a really educational reason to be on your phones.)

● Books travel. Remember books can travel. To appointments. To camp. On airplanes and in cars. You can pack them or access them virtually.

Showing up to summer with a reading plan positions you for success. I hope these tips are helpful. An RSVP is not needed for the summer reading invitation. I will know if you accepted upon your return in September.

Yours in Reading,

Gina Richard Grade 6 ELA Teacher/Summer Reading Coordinator
